But not once did it happen. In fact, the multiplied millions of mutations induced by countless irradiations did not in one instance even improve the fruit fly species, much less change it into another one! All that was accomplished was the production of such miserable creatures as you see on these two pages. Few men have been as embittered as have conscientious geneticists who have dedicated their lives to fruit fly research,—for they saw clearly what few scientists would admit—that evolution is impossible.
